Innuos ZENith Statement

We've had little more than a few quick plays with the Innuos ZENith Statement because they are proving so popular that they are in very short supply (every one allocated to us ends up being sold to reduce the backlog of sales), but even the briefest of exposure to the ZENith Statement shows you are in the presence of something special.

The full media server uses Innuos' basic concepts that hold right down to the latest version of the half-sized ZEN, including separate linear power supplies, careful case construction to isolate key subsystems, and a custom OS designed specifically for media replay. However, it takes those concepts to their logical extremes, with separate boxes with clever chambered internal housings to keep everything fully isolated from other parts of the Statement.

The 'killer app' though is just what these things do to the sound of the Statement, compared to almost any other server (including Innuos' own). The company does a short demonstration at shows, comparing the 'it can't get better than this' limited edition ZENith SE Mk II to the Statement. Those who can afford it, buy a Statement, and those who can't start planning their own version of Breaking Bad just to rustle up the money to own one.
